Dear Charles,

One of the most profound questions that has not been deeply revisited in recent times in education is “What should be taught in an age of Google?”, as access to information has dramatically redefined what should be part of a 21st century curriculum. I applaud your initiative to set up a globally-minded Center for Curriculum Redesign to explore and solve the questions, with participation from academia, corporations, foundations, jurisdictions, and NGO’s.

This effort is as far-reaching as it is timely. I am very glad to support this effort by joining your Board of Advisors.

Best Regards,
